Mice Grew Wings To Reach Food

SEATTLE, May 28.—George J. McGill, of the street sweeping force, claims credit for developing winged mice.

McGill eats his midnight lunch in the police station assembly room. Mice of the common house breed were attracted by the crumbs dropped on the floor during the lunch hour. McGill noticed that the mice soon grew less wild and came closer in their search for something to nibble on. He tied bits of bread and cheese on a string, and at first pulled the mice toward him. Then he hung the string over the chair back, and in time the mice came to turn it to the point where the bread or cheese was tied. Gradually the food was tied higher until finally it was as high as the chandelier, eight feet from the cement floor.

Often the mice fell from this height. As time passed during the last eighteen months, McGill says the falls became more frequent and, to McGill's wonderment, easier for the mice.

Recently McGill says, he discovered that when certain of the mice lost their hold on the string, instead of falling they soared off and alighted upright several feet away.

On examination he found that a thin skin had grown from the bodies of the mice and extended along the forelegs to the heel, forming a wing-like appendage.

McGill believes that constant falling from the string on which their nightly meals were tied has led nature to assist them, and that the wings are the result.

Involving as it does the Month-end clearance of Odd Lots at tremendous reductions—things needed for MEMORIAL DAY outings at special prices, and special purchases offered at almost unheard-of savings. Every item of this advertisement teems with greatest interest to YOU.

There is good news from the front. The fish are again attacking everything in the bait line in sight, and the city needs its piscatorial defenders.

For instance, yesterday one Ed Craig took his little boat from Reynolds's fishing emporium, and battled his way against the current, with a herring above Fletcher's above Bolling Rock, to the vantage point called The Rippings, and the Time-table Rock.

He fished for about three hours, using bloodworms as bait, and in that brief time he landed eleven magnificent rock, the smallest weighing three pounds, while the largest tipped the scale to seven. Not only did he catch this comfortable number of fish, but he saw rock darting below of great size.

When he returned to the city, full of his subject, and spent some moments in lamenting his failure to provide himself with whole herring for bait. He is convinced that while the gigantic rock passed his puny offering of blood worms by, as unworthy of regal notice, had a good herring, with attending shreds of succulent fish-flesh, been offered, all fish dignity would have been sacrificed, and he would have landed some record-breakers.
